

Science Begets Distrust.

This second change leads to self-distrust, as the first led to distrust of other men. As we have not to take our truth at second hand from other thinkers, so we learn that we must not take it, if the expression may be used, from ourselves. Truth is not what we think, any more than it is what famous men have thought. That which irresistibly strikes us as true, that which seems self-evident, that which commends itself to us may nevertheless, we learn, not be true at all. It is not enough to judge for ourselves, to examine the facts according to a rigorous method, which has been elaborated by a long series of investigators, and without which neither candor nor impartiality would save us either from seeing wrong, or from receiving unsound evidence, or from generalizing too fast, or from allowing some delusive name to come between us and the reality. Distrust of others, distrust of ourselves—if the first of these two factors of the scientific spirit were separated from the second the result would be mere self-conceit, mere irreverence. As it is, the scientific spirit is simply a jealous watchfulness against that tendency of human nature to read itself into the universe, which will show itself both in each individual and in the very greatest investigators, and which can only be controlled by rigorously adhering to a fixed process, and rigidly verifying the work of others by the same. [From "Natural Religion," in Popular Science Monthly for May.]

Oil and repair the harness. Unbuckle all the parts and wash clean with soft water, soap and a brush. A little turpentine or benzine will take off any gummy substance which the soap fails to remove. Then warm the leather, and, as soon as dry on the surface, apply the oil with a paint brush or a swab. Neat's foot oil is the best. Hang up the harness in a warm place to dry, but do not let it burn.

The Chinese tailors of San Francisco have struck, and have posted bills throughout the Chinese quarter offering a reward of $400 for the killing of any boss tailor who manifests a disinclination to pay the rate of remuneration demanded, and an additional reward of $300 for the killing of any tailor who consents to work for less than the rate so fixed.
